The men are entirely destitute. The greatest excitament followed the arrest, and threats of all sorts were made. A man denounced as a spy was seized upon and horribly beaten under the eyes of the regulars, who looked on without evineing the least dispesition to interfere. The officers commanding the regulars became bewildered, scarcely knowing what to do. They had had very good reason to believe that we listened to a song trilled forth in the most artistic manner, querying mentally the while whether it was French, Italian or what foreign tongue, and have been chagrined to find it was only English. But ed, scarcely knowing what to do. They had had very good reason to believe that they could not make their men attack the Fenians, many of whom had served with them in the late rabellion. Meanwhile Major Silvey went to Hefferman and Murphy, and besought them to come out and quell the disturbance and disperse the crowd. They readily acquiesced and speke to the crowd at some length beseehing them to keep untarnished the reputation they had guined under the stars and stripes in the war of the rebellion by keeping quiet and doing nothing to disgrace the mown in our vocabulary.
